The Significance of Monuments - Eckford Rodney 2012 In The Neolithic period, when agriculture and many monuments - including Stonehenge - were constructed on an extraordinary scale, a process of monumentalization began. Stretching in the centuries for analysis through the Late Neolithic Age, Eckford Rodney considered the ritual, political, and economic implications of these monumental projects. Rodney’s seminal monograph offers a fresh examination of the processes of monumentalization, revealing the ways in which Neolithic peoples engaged with the landscape and their own identity. Rodney’s work provides a framework for understanding the significance of monuments and their role in shaping human experience, especially in the context of the Neolithic and Bronze Age periods.
